THE VESSEL

A proper pilothouse motoryacht — teak joinery, twin diesels.

This 1996 Ocean Alexander 548 is the kind of boat the Pacific Northwest was made for. Ocean Alexander built their reputation on heavily-built, teak-joined pilothouse motoryachts that could run the Inside Passage in comfort, and the 548 sits right in the sweet spot of that lineage — big enough to live aboard for a season, small enough for a couple to run.

The saloon is finished in warm teak with a large L-shaped settee, opposing armchairs and windows on three sides. Forward and up, a true pilothouse gives you a raised helm with a settee behind it — the place you will actually spend your time when the weather turns. The galley sits down and forward, laid out for real cooking rather than reheating.

Accommodation is two staterooms and two heads: a full-beam master with a walkaround berth and en-suite, and a guest cabin with twin berths and its own head with separate shower stall. Below, a walk-in engine room houses twin diesels with standing access down the centreline and clean, labelled electrical distribution — the sort of engine space that says a boat has been maintained rather than merely used.

Topside, the flybridge carries Furuno radar, a second helm and generous seating, with a broad foredeck forward. A serious cruising platform, offered at $500,000. Survey, service history and sea trial available on request.
